Given the presence of the mHealth monitoring device, a variety of age-appropriate strategies were used by respondents to address a range of developmental, health-related, and routine care concerns. Over half of respondents used a combination of these strategies, and 57% cited face-to-face visits to their provider as a primary means of resolving a concern. Despite the developmental capacities of infants to interact with caregivers and engage with caregivers, it is notable that a majority of respondents in this study cited a provider visit as a way to address a range of concerns. This speaks to the importance of having a provider available for care during the infancy period, and is supported by literature highlighting the significance of in-person provider visits for supporting developmental and behavioral advancements in infants.^[@bibr27-2333794X16681470],[@bibr28-2333794X16681470]^ Further research is needed to determine how technology interacts with the presence of the health care professional during the infancy period, and the potential
