The new federal law that requires all broadcast TV stations in the United States to remove advertisements that promote tobacco products has reportedly caused Sony's advertising agency to stop selling them in the U.S. U.S. law prohibits tobacco advertising on TV or radio, but numerous exemptions apply. Sony's agency, S+A, faced the inevitable questions about that ban and its effect on it. "We were asked if S+A was selling advertising spots that are pre-empted by [the broadcast law]," Sony Television Worldwide CEO Greg Johnson told Reuters. "And I was told no, we are not." But what about tobacco products that aren't advertised? "So if someone were to buy the advertising space, they wouldn't be able to run the spot for tobacco?" Johnson asked. "The answer is no." My car doesn't give a code when I try to read the codes. I'm not sure if it's the system or the code reader. Would a $80 OBDII tester do anything for me? I'm not really worried about diagnosing the issues, just seeing if my car is reading the codes. A: I'm not really worried about diagnosing the issues If your car doesn't give you a code why would you worry about it? That's like worrying that you can't move your own fingers. It's not going to change anything. If the dealer tells you "this code means..." then look it up. If they say "There is no code, it doesn't mean..." then you need a code reader. A: The only thing you'll need a tester for is to find out if you have a code reader or not. It's a cheap and easy fix to add, but it's also one that's pretty far from your skill level. A: No, you shouldn't spend a few hundred dollars on a device that is more for the "consumer" market. Instead, you should find yourself a reputable automotive mechanic. They will be able to diagnose the issue and most likely more than likely, point you to a different problem than one with your vehicle. This is not to say they can fix the vehicle itself. In fact, they probably can't do that unless it's a catastrophic failure. I would also recommend finding a local automotive body shop to get a second opinion. Q: How to disable system applications in mac I have windows 7, so i have many system applications in my menu bar, for example - i use my menu bar as a email client, and i need to disable other applications, and i can't, because i don't know which of them is that. So my question is - how to disable or hide system applications from menu bar? A: You can disable the system applications by just unchecking the "Applications" menu from the System Preferences -> Dock section. However, as pointed out in the comments, many of the system applications include Apple's own software and the system menu is required by OSX. If you want to disable them entirely (and not just keep them out of the "Applications" menu) you can boot into Recovery mode and permanently disable them from the Terminal app (open it from the Applications -> Utilities folder). You'll then have to
