Forensic Medicine Narayan Reddy Ks S, P Murty (Nobel Prize 1981). MORE. Narayan Reddy Book Of Forensic Medicine Ks S. Osborn. forensic medicine if you wear regular glasses, contact lenses, eye glasses or similar you may encounter changes in your vision that you believe are caused by the eyewear. It is likely to be a change in contrast sensitivity or eyestrain - not necessary acuity problems. In this article, we will look at the effects of eyewear on your vision to see if it is likely that the change in vision is caused by your eyewear or something else. Understanding the way the eye functions and the manner in which your eyewear works can help you understand whether there is any reason to change your eyewear. The Visual System of the Eye The eye is a globe of transparent tissue that is located in the middle of the front of the head. It includes the retina, a circular surface on the inside of the eye, to convert light into nerve impulses that are transmitted to the brain. The outer layer of the eye is the cornea, which is the main eye window. The cornea is thick so it is transparent, protecting the eye from foreign objects and allowing light to enter. The iris is the coloured part of the eye, which controls the amount of light entering the eye and the amount of light reflected back out. The iris is a membrane with a central circular coloured area called the pupil, surrounded by a variable ring of small coloured areas called the iris. The iris opens and closes in response to light and varies in size to change the amount of light entering the eye. The inside surface of the eye, called the retina, is a structure that is covered by a layer called the retina. The retina is the light-sensitive part of the eye. It contains many rod cells and cone cells. The rod cells contain photoreceptors, which are the receptors in the cells that detect light. Photoreceptors convert light into electrical impulses that then pass through the nerve cells and travel to the brain. The back of the eye is the ocular globe, which holds the eye-lens and the optic nerve that conducts impulses from the retina. The lens focuses light on the retina. The optic nerve carries the impulses from the retina to the brain. The fovea, the part of the retina that has very
