Bioluminescent imaging with a photoprotein for in vivo luminescence in larvae of Paracentridae (Teleostei). A bioluminescent imaging method, in which larvae of the cichlid fish, Aequidens pulcher, were evaluated by in vivo photopic luminescence, was developed using a photoprotein, the aequorin gene. The luminescence of larvae of this fish had a peak at around 400-450 nm. Transgenic larvae of this fish were examined by in vivo imaging at a depth of 150-180 mm below the epidermis of the larvae. Photopic luminescence at this depth appeared to originate from the body, and the intensity of the luminescence was stronger in the anterior region than in the posterior region of the body. Anterior-posterior asymmetry of luminescence was also shown in lamprey larvae. This bioluminescent method could be useful for long-term in vivo imaging of living animals.
