Is there a conspiracy to discredit critical thinking? - 001sky Is there a conspiracy to discredit critical thinking among university students? Or perhaps the opposite conspiracy? That is, those who are interested in critical thinking are held up against those who, for some reason, are not interested. ===== Mz I'd suggest following some of the "thought" being discussed here: [Some of the people there are PhDs, and I am fairly sure they really have considerable knowledge in the field. The comments I have read have been serious and thought-provoking. ----- jim_swart I've been in several classes in these types of courses that have taught me a lot about critical thinking. I tend to argue in the margins more than I have understood or mastered. Exploring self-disclosure as a construct across adulthood: a quasi-longitudinal study. Understanding self-disclosure has been the object of substantial research efforts.

We explored the role of five self-disclosure facets - purpose, recognition, disclosure of secrets, variety of details, and amount of social disclosure - in the construction of self-disclosure. This was done using a quasi-longitudinal approach with a sample of 223 individuals within three age groups across adulthood (i.e., 20s, 50s, and 80s). This is the first study to examine the role of the five facets in the construction of self-disclosure. The findings show that self-disclosure across adulthood is a dynamic and flexible construct. This flexibility can be attributed to the interaction of each self-disclosure facet with others. Nevertheless, the findings show that, at the same time, there is a relatively stable self-disclosure pattern over time. These results support the view that self-disclosure is an effective strategy for disclosing one's identity. Aging and working memory: a review and a new model. The hypothesis that working memory (WM) may be the most critical deficit in dementia has been studied using the same protocols in young and old subjects, thus ignoring the well-established age-related decrease 6d1f23a050
