Manual'. On day one of the forums, there were some surprises, some laughs, and a host of differing opinions on topics including the attacks on Captain Phasma at the opening ceremonies. The new Star Wars fan forums, hosted by FX and social media network RDF, began today, kicking off with an opening ceremony that included a new clip and audio commentary from the second and final season of Game of Thrones. The promotion continued with a special edition tee featuring the iconic line from the Stormtrooper's dialogue in Return of the Jedi: "You don't belong on my ship." Additional scenes from George Lucas' 1983 original Star Wars and its 2012 sequel, The Force Awakens, were shown as the forum's main topic of discussion. We posed a few questions, starting with who'd be captain of the new fan forums. "The community will be the captains," RDF creator Jason Chung told us in an interview. "It's a community driven board, and we're here for the fans, so we think [the community] is going to feel more productive than before." Chung's group will be responsible for the forum's content, according to statements made to The Hollywood Reporter. "We want to make it bigger. It's not just a huge message board anymore," Chung told THR. "We want the forums to feel more like a website, and it's more of a community forum for fans to come together and create something." The new forums will house a backlog of over 1,000 posts, which will be accessible to all Star Wars fans, as opposed to just the ability to post. Part of the new forums' attraction is that it uses the same technology that powered the Star Wars: The Force Awakens trailers and FX's Goodfellas, which promoted its new series. Chung said that using those platforms was key to the success of the forums.

"We wanted a more holistic approach to social media marketing," Chung said. "In the
