The Baldachin is one of the most important and complicated Byzantine architectural monuments of the tenth century. It was probably designed by the patrician Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, the widow of Theoderic's nephew Hildegard. Early tenth-century images of churches show her in her apartments in the imperial palace complex in the northern yard, above the tetrarchy entrance on the southern side. Hrotsvit is seated on a throne in a wall niche. 22 This representation suggests the closeness of the artist to her patron. In the Codex Aureus, the baldachin is now situated in a separate, independent building, the first floor of which is often opened to the public. 23 Hrotsvit's artwork was incorporated into the design of the new, Carolingian-era cathedral of Aachen and was intended as the coronation shrine of the new dynasty. It is a building charged with spiritual and political power. 24 Charles the Bald incorporated the part of the shrine which belonged to his wife, Wihtburh, into his own palace. The artist considered the ensemble a single architectural complex. 25 The earliest architectural plans for the Baldachin were drawn out during the reign of Conrad the Elder. A second design had to wait until the reign of Charlemagne, who gave the orders in 814 for a new one, with some small additions and modifications. 26 Some fifteen years later, a new agreement stipulated the completion of the ensemble by the year 834. 27 A detailed, modern and current overview of the archaeology and the archaeology of the maior domus at the Aachen Cathedral can be found in Koehler and Mtherich, Die Hofschule Karls des Kahlen, 729.

We know that, in the rule of his half brother, Ludwig the Pious, the style in which Charles the Bald writes and signs is also quite similar. 17 Carolingian miniatures from this period also convey a sense of luxury and ease of movement and also of informal speech and casual gesture. Carolingian miniatures of Ludwig seem to be especially concerned with depicting the luxurious garments, rich furnishings, and luxuriant gardens of the ruler and his immediate family. While the artist of the Codex Aureus transfers the ruler portrait of Ludwig to a foundation that is attached to a wall, and adds a roof and windows to the building, the minstrel of the San Paolo Bible transfers the ruler portrait of Ludwig to a throne with the legs of the throne supported on the ground and the arms extending to the sides. Both the Codex Aureus and the San Paolo Bible of Ludwig can thus be thought of as documents of a particular moment of time, recording the moment in which the rulers hope to gain and maintain a position of prestige and power. 19 The divine Father promised eternal happiness to all who had faith in the Messiah. Eriugena, working within the Carolingian tradition of the diadema's puer, turned this promise into a description of the relationships among the natural and celestial world, mankind, and God. In the vision, Charles the Bald is the puer, speaking in behalf of mankind, as the only true monarch of the Carolingians.

The diadema crown surrounds him, which makes him anointed by God to rule over mankind. This royal superiority and access to God is bestowed by the Lamb, which marks the divinitas (divinity) that Charles receives from the heavenly source. It was probably this vision that moved the poet to dedicate the Codex Aureus to Charles the Bald. 5ec8ef588b
